OCTOBER
2011

MONTHLY SUMMARY

Stock markets rallied in October with the S&P 500 index delivering its best monthly return since December 1991. Key drivers behind the rally included excessive pessimism at the end of the third quarter, incrementally positive economic releases, and progress on the European sovereign debt front. Despite low and declining consumer sentiment, retail sales, particularly autos, showed strength in September. In what is likely an unsustainable move, however, Americans saved less and spent more of their paychecks. The resulting four year low in the savings rate helped to fuel a 2.5% annualized gain in U.S. third quarter GDP. Business inventories rose and both the ISM Manufacturing index and the Fed's industrial production statistics confirm manufacturing continues to grow, albeit at a slower pace. European leaders worked throughout the month to craft a plan to deal with sovereign debt issues and to halt related contagion. The resulting blueprint was somewhat shy on details but was much more aggressive than the roadmap laid out during the summer. Markets reacted favorably to the process as well as its results.

Significant uncertainty remains. The Congressional super committee has until November 23 to arrive at deficit reduction recommendations. Progress thus far appears limited and partisan squabbling is apparent. A further U.S. government debt downgrade may hang in the balance. As for monetary policy, the Fed is entertaining a QE3 plan targeted at the mortgage market. Last, but certainly not least, the call for a referendum in Greece on the latest bailout package throws the entire process into disarray with a "no" vote in January having potentially dire ramifications.
